Rallroad Iron. The value of Railroad Iron in Liverpool at our last advices was £12 5s. or very nearly $60 per ton, with a prospect of going, up too. If we had continued to present and prospective demand for it there, can any intelligent man doubt that it would have been still higher? Yet at this price, it can hardly be delivered in New York, Freight and Charges paid, for less than $70 per ton. Duty unpaid. Yet American Iron-Masters, we learn, are contracting to deliver Railroad Bars of excellent quality at $70 per ton; so that at this moment our heavy daily of $25 per ton on this Iron does not essentially if at all enhance its price to the American consumer. And the Iron business is now receiving such a rapid and general develop ment among us that it is morally certain that the price of Iron of all kinds will be gradually and signally reduced, without the aid of Foreign competition, unless the demand for Iron shall increase as rapidly as the supply, which can hardly be possible. Who can doubt, then, that it is the true policy of the country to maintain the duty on Iron ?

We have a number of letters from this State, some of which we might publish, but we do not see lit. giving accounts of the Folitical aspects in that State. They all agree on one point—that the Whigs, under existing circumstances, might carry the State if they would try, but probably will not. We were originally averse to their notion of keeping their proceedings quiet, but we now believe they acted wisely. They did not wish to figure in the newspapers as speech makers, and be caricatured and misrepresented in most of them. We have been reported in half a dozen papers as a member and active participant in that Convention, when we were never present at one of its meetings. Yet we heartly thise with its object-that of devising some means of improving the conditions of Labor, here and every where; and the fact that a majority of the members disagree with us on the Tariff question does not disturb that sympathy. Yesterday afternoon Ruffus Dawies, Esq. delivered an Address on Invention. He said:

When the fathers of the Republic sent forth to the admiring world the Declaration of Independence, it was given principally in the spirit of prophecy. So far as perfect freedom from the trammels of foreign legislation was considered, that independence was, of course immediate; but the real, the complete independence, which they foreshadowed, and which they could discern only in visions of the future, is now proclaimed in these halls. Yes, fellow-citizens, the true signers of your Declaration of Independence are now among you; they are your artisans, your mechanics and your farmers, who each successive year come up from the most distant States to this our American Olympia with newer and better and stronger assurance of freedom, they come here individually to exhibit before the abliest representatives of the Union—this Congress of American mechanics and farmers, and their friends who assemble with them—the magnificent achievements of their invention, the pledges of their national birthright; they come here to show what they mean to do hereafter for the glory and honor of their country, and to send from this place voice to the National Capitol that shall ring among its marble corridors with irresixtible eloquence.
